

New courses get thumbs-up from traders

London, UK. 9 September 2007 - Tradernomics has begun trials of a new range of home-study financial trading courses for beginners. Early reactions from customers have been positive, and the company will now begin a detailed editorial review before launching the new courses in 2008.

Three individual courses cover trading in CFDs, foreign exchange and futures. The products are aimed at retail traders and at those beginning a professional trading career. Courses will be available from www.tradernomics.com, priced at £495 each.

The courses have been compiled by active trader Stephan Bisse, formerly of Goldman Sachs and Deutsche Bank, who also develops trading systems for city hedge funds.

The courses will deliver the vital professional-level concepts rarely covered or even understood by many trading authors. They take the reader from the basics of markets and risk management through to fully developed trading strategies.

Alongside printed workbooks, traders can practice with a patent-pending trading simulator, which greatly speeds up mastering the skills needed to be profitable. When a trader graduates to the real markets, he or she will be thoroughly prepared to win.

Stephan Bisse, Chairman of Tradernomics, commented:

“I have developed this course to teach people how to trade successfully in a logical, consistent, and above all, accessible manner.”

Ian Howlett, Chief Executive of Tradernomics, commented:

“Trading can be highly financially rewarding. These courses finally give aspiring traders the full knowledge they need to succeed, in a clear and concise way.”
